TUTANKHAMUN

One of the last century's most momentous discoveries is celebrated by a writing instrument fit for a king. Discovered in 1922 by archaeologist Howard Carter, Tutankhamun's tomb contained many of the world's greatest treasures, and triggered worldwide interest in ancient civilizations.

Though Tutankhamun's reign over Egypt was short, the young pharaoh's command of the popular imagination spans millennia. Now, Italian craftsmanship reckons with the mythos of Tutankhamun in two ultra-rare editions.

 Tutankhamun's death mask is among the world's most celebrated artworks. Cloisonné, bas-relief and black diamonds decorate a sculpted recreation of one of history's most iconic symbols.

 Made in fountain pen and rollerball, Tutankhamun marks the centenary of Carter's epic discovery with 100 numbered pieces in vermeil + sterling silver, and only 10 in solid 18K gold.

 A diorama showcase reconstructs the wonder of Tutankhamun's burial chamber for private display.

On 4 November 1922, the British archaeologist and Egyptologist Howard Carter found the tomb of Tutankhamun, 13th pharaoh of Egypt's 18th dynasty. Carter had devoted 30 years of his life to this moment, and his discovery sent shockwaves around the world.

The young ruler's tomb remains the only royal Egyptian burial site ever found completely intact. Undisturbed for 3,300 years, it contained more than 5,000 valuable artefacts. In its burial chamber, Tutankhamun's mummy lay exactly as it had been buried, enshrined within a trio of nested coffins.

Measuring 188cm in length, his innermost coffin was found to be made of 110kg of solid gold, glass and precious stones. A century after his unearthing, the pharaoh awaits his lavish new home in Giza's Grand Egyptian Museum.
